Intra-oral scanning and implant prosthetics design

Intra-oral scanners are routinely used today as part of a digital work for dental implant prosthetic reconstruction. It offers many benefits over conventional impressions including cost, patients with gagging, limited mouth opening and accuracy. With a shift towards CAD/CAM restoration intra oral scanning allows for better laboratory communications and complete control of the prosthetic design by the clinician. The technology however does have a learning curve and there are limitations which need to be understood by the clinician. The evening will address these and also provide a sound grounding in single unit implant prosthetic designs.
